Blogger Darlings, Alcoholic Faith Mission Ready With Third Release, Let This Be the Last Night We Care.

Alcoholic Faith Mission, the paradoxically named Danish quintet who flew their second album, 421 Wythe Avenue into worldwide music-blogger praise and record label love in three continents, are looking forward to the spring release of their third album, Let This Be the Last Night We Care.

The PonyRec protégés hit stride in 2009 with critical acclaim from the international music press and more adoration from bloggers around the planet. Not only did they make many of the Best of 2009 lists, they've got four songs on the soundtrack of a Canadian independent film called, Point Traverse, and were just asked to play a variety of gigs and festivals in the US.

With the ink drying on a two-album deal for a Tokyo label Quince Records, and the upcoming PonyRec/Paper Garden Records release of 421 Wythe Avenue in the States, one could say things look promising for these pleasingly discordant Danes.

"On the other hand," says Thorben Seiero, the band's front man and co-founder, "with the success of 421, this album's got a hell of a lot to live up to."

Look for AFM to do three tours of Europe in 2010, a date or two in Japan, and potentially mini-tour of the U.S.

Please enjoy!
